Chapter 5:

How To Use Twitter For Your Blog

---

Twitter is numerous things to a lot of individuals. For a few, it's a virtual water cooler. For other people, it's an awesome way to acquire answers to questions. Since I started utilizing Twitter, I've more than doubled my blog traffic over the last many months, and I can say how.

The Inside Info

Some individuals just dump their blog posts into Twitter mechanically, with a simple new blog post. I've detected a way of utilizing Twitter to boost participation on my site, and it's better than simple; it's in good taste.

Rather than telling your Twitter audience that you have released a fresh post, ask them their feeling on the core subject you've covered. "Do you believe banner ads are absolute?"

Abided by a link to your web site is much more appealing than placing on Twitter, "Banner Ads Are Not Absolute." Asking a question enlists your Twitter followers and asks for their experience.

I authentically trust that the comments part of my blog is better than anything I compose on my own. To that end, when a subject seems to take off, I send off a note to Twitter alerting individuals to the caliber of the conversation in the comments.

It is not pitchy in nature. I'm merely sharing that the most beneficial stuff followed the initial post.

My number 2 referrer to my web site on most slow-medium traffic days is StumbleUpon. As I seem to get "greater" response from individuals who visit from that web site than from additional traffic sources, I occasionally will send a 3rd post to Twitter, asking if somebody thinks X post is worth a Stumble. As I do much sharing and promoting and helping other people, I commonly get a lot of willing individuals to Stumble something for me from time to time.

I don't exaggerate it, and I know that not every day is a "slayer blog post" day. With this in mind, when I do ask, it makes a vast difference.

So in the long run, I ask my following in Twitter for love 3 times: once when I post the blog, once again if it takes off well in the comments section, and occasionally a 3rd time if I wish to truly amp the traffic thru StumbleUpon. I mix these requests in liberally with all the assorted ways I help other people utilizing Twitter, and so it doesn't come off like I'm constantly pitching my own junk.

My present monthly rate of pitching others vs. Marketing my own site is 75 / 25 in other individuals' favor. That sounds fair, correct?

Chapter 6:

What To Watch Out For

---

There are certain things that should be avoided when using twitter. The main things that one should avoid is the words used such as stating that the individual is a social media expert, guru or money making expert.

What To Choose And Not

Having a little humility when addressing those on twitter is something to be observed diligently. Avoid coming on like a know it all character as this would eventually cause those on twitter to form a negative opinion which in turn could hurt the possible business opportunities launched.

Even if the main aim of engaging others on twitter is to garner business revenue, creating exchanges that only focus on this can be boring and pushy.

The contents of a twitting exchange should be varies in order to keep the flow going and the interest present rather than just trying to sell a product. Besides this avoid twitting on the same topic too frequently.

This will cause people to avoid being involved in the exchange as it would be deemed a waste of their time and effort. Avoid underestimating the effort and time that should be given to having a fruitful tweet.

Avoid tweeting on sensitive matters as this could create undesirable effects and definitely not keep the focus on making money for the site. Although some individual use twitter for this purpose, the individual should definitely avoid engaging others is this form of twitting as it may also end up hurting the business opportunities that may have formed it not for this style of twitting.

Wrapping Up
